In vitro comparison of ureteral perforation susceptibility between poly-L/D-lactide and polyurethane ureteral stents. Ureteral perforation is a major complication after ureteral stent placement. It is known that the upper ureter has a low perforation susceptibility. The purpose of this study was to compare the perforation susceptibility of the lower ureter between two different materials: poly-L/D-lactide and polyurethane. Under fluoroscopic guidance, 10 fresh canine ureters were implanted with either poly-L/D-lactide (PDLLA) or polyurethane (PU) stents. The stents were subjected to a 300-N tension at 10 cm/min and to a 500-N tension at 30 cm/min. The stents were cut into 6 sections along their entire length. The stent sections were then fixed and sectioned into 10-microm-thick slices. The area of each perforation was measured and the thickness of the stent was measured at each perforation site. The perforation sites in both the PDLLA and PU stents were equally distributed throughout the 6 sections of the stents. However, the PU stents perforated at significantly greater thicknesses than did the PDLLA stents (P
